ABSTRACT

The basic unit of society is home and family. An ideal society is created when the environment of the house is clean and piety. Mother is the queen of the house and new generations are born from the lap of the mother and she grows up in her hands. The mother and the home are the guarantors of Islam have given honour and dignity to woman. Woman is a mother and child is the way to paradise and home is a training ground where the personality of the child is brightened and refined. In this training centre children become good and successful human beings. From the earliest stages of the child's womb to childhood, he sees and learns from the mother and the home. It is up to the mother how she raises her child and how she provides a good environment for the child. The home is the first institution for the upbringing and training of the child. The role of mother and home in the ideal age of Prophet Hood and Islam was very prominent and ideal in terms of reforming society. In the light of Sira-un-Nabi, the role of family, mother and home will be highlighted in the context of training of individuals in a reformed society.
